Lewistown native's inspirational program connects youth in Montana communities

James Zormeir, a 2007 Fergus High grad, has overcome many obstacles and found his way into a job at Nike, where creativity is key. WHAT started as an assembly has become a life mission for Lewistown native Dani Phillips. A former teacher and basketball coach at Hardin High School, former student teacher in Browning and a 2008 Fergus High grad, Dani has combined her experiences to create a bridge to help youth from different backgrounds celebrate one another.

Called Unreserved, this one-hour-a-week extracurricular humanities program for grades 10-12 is designed – as indicated in its mission statement – “to strengthen social structures in schools and give participants the chance to become the subject.”

“It’s an empowerment program that closes the gap between our diverse communities and embraces the social richness of the state,” Dani said. “The content is made up of students’ lives and diverse speakers’ knowledge and interests.”

Unreserved began as a one-time event Dani put together while teaching in Hardin, but the project has morphed into a full-time job that continues to evolve. Made up of a team of teachers, students and speakers, the goal is for all involved to build connections, learn from, and inspire one another.

“Ideally, these connections will encourage teamwork and progress while strengthening interests and ideas,” Dani said.

Dani Phillips, former teacher and coach, combined her experiences to create Unreserved, a program to help youth from different backgrounds celebrate one another.

Creating this concept was an organic process, Dani said, and was inspired by many of the mentors and cultural experiences she had in reservation communities. It was also inspired by one moment in particular when she was recognized by one of her players on Hardin Senior Night.

“At Hardin Senior Night, seniors are given the opportunity to give thanks to one or two of their mentors by giving them a cultural Pendleton blanket,” said Dani.

“Sossity Spotted Wolf honored me with one, and that way of celebrating success really struck me. It honored

MANAGER'S MESSAGE

From Carson Sweeney

THE warmer spring weather is certainly greening up our service territory. What a beautiful area we get to call home.

We hope our members are blessed with moisture throughout the spring and summer. As members begin working in their fields, please be mindful of using your equipment near power lines.

Some of the new farming equipment is quite tall even when completely folded up for travel. Also be mindful when utilizing GPS software for auto steer in your fields. If Fergus Electric has recently installed or replaced poles or ground mounted equipment, the GPS routes may need to be modified.

reciprocity, and that's what I wanted to adopt into Unreserved. There was an element of reciprocity at Unreserved's first meeting at Fergus this year. Those who have helped make this program a reality were acknowledged and represented through enlarged photos we held up during the event. A neat group of people have joined around this and have been integral in working towards our goals."

There is much involved with Unreserved, but, according to Dani, what makes it so effective is the format it uses for students and speakers to tell their story: four quadrants combining heritage, hurdle, happiness and hope.

"We start with heritage to bring up something (or someone) in their past that influences who they are today, hurdle to represent how they have overcome an obstacle, happiness to share something that brings them joy and hope to close with what they wish to do with their lives," Dani said. "All of these subjects pull on parts of who they are, and it's been a powerful experience for those who have participated, be it students or presenters."

This was especially the case for James Zormeir, a 2007 Fergus grad and current Nike shoe designer who spoke to participating students from his alma mater, Browning and Hardin, via the online platform Zoom in March.

An integral part of the creative development behind the nearly all-recyclable Space Hippie shoe, James is grateful to have a successful artistic career, but it was no cakewalk getting there. He made this clear when sharing his hurdle.

A hurdle, Dani said, can be a disease, family occurrence, experience, social issue or some kind of loss. Dani wants all participants to feel supported around what they choose to represent. Courage, she said, is appreciated and admired, and James's courage to share such hardships about his loss meant a lot to the students present.

"The kids appreciated his example of being able to speak about difficult things," Dani said. "Everything about James' address embodied my hopes for Unreserved. The way he used the format to tell his story illustrated just how effectual it is as an inspirational tool and how it's a way to connect people from all different walks of life. It's prompt and personal."

James' presentation was also an excellent example of perseverance.

"He had a lot of reasons to quit," Dani said, "but he didn't. He took control of the paint brush."

Students also have the opportunity to take control of the paintbrush and design their own Nike shoe based on their experiences and emotions, an artistic assignment that is another part of the Unreserved curriculum.

Giving voice to the students

James is one of several speakers Dani put together for this year's weekly convocations. Other speakers included renowned rock n' roll drummer Mark Schulman (perhaps best known for backing up P!nk), elephant trainer (and Lewistown native) Chrissy Pratt, Christian Parrish Takes The Gun (aka Supaman) and others. But what excites Dani the most is hearing directly from students, such as Lefaye Russell and Andrea Dickinson, who spoke during a recent

All-School Zoom Ceremony. Lefaye is an enrolled member of the Crow Tribe (she introduced herself in her native language) while Andrea is Canadian Cree. During their talk they shared their interests, a bit about their childhood, their dreams and their hopes for the future. Despite different backgrounds, they were united by their similarities. This is just one example, Dani said, of the real-life impact Unreserved can have.

"I think [Unreserved] is the best way to get people to care about each other," Dani said.

Just the beginning

At the time of publication there were around 55 students enrolled in the program, which offers a variety of ways for participants to interact with students from different schools. As the program continues to grow, Dani hopes to see it expand into more schools, which is already happening.

"Unreserved has seven schools interested in incorporating our format," Dani said. "This can be implemented for a week into a core class and, if schools like how it goes, they can also get involved in our humanities program, which includes speakers who use the format in order to tell their stories."

Dani said the potential of Unreserved is greater than she imagined at the get-go, which gives her much momentum moving forward.

"The goal is to continue to expand and see how many schools sign on," she said. "Ultimately I'd like to involve more schools from outside the state, as well. There are already three urban schools confirmed to take in the format and its week-long unit. It's going to be a challenge, but I'm excited and humbled to move forward."

Dani is no stranger to hurdles, and she's ready to take another leap, thanks largely to the immense support she's received and the relationships she's developed while bringing this unique concept to life.
